South Carolina's Laetrile controversy

Illustration by Jeff Gandy

by Nancy Mayberry

"The only thing I can say is if people don't believe Laetrile works, how can they explain me?" Pat G. Smith of Springdale says.

Smith, 55, sat in the living room of his home in Lexington County and talked about the drug and about cancer. The afternoon sun filtered through the curtains into a room tastefully decorated in warm greens and dark woods. Portraits of Smith's family and a young woman in a wedding gown hung on the walls. A copy of The Baptist Hymnal rested on a piano. It didn't look like a home which has been touched by a dreaded disease.

Smith doesn't look as if he has been touched by it either. He is thin but speaks with vigor. The only time a wince of pain crossed his face was when he spoke of a friend who recently learned he has leukemia. Smith was told he had cancer, a mucus-secreting carcinoma, in May, 1975. In June, he began Laetrile treatments.

Laetrile is the commercial name for the chemical amygdalin. It is also referred to as Vitamin B-17, although medical authorities say it is not actually a vitamin. Amygdalin is found in the pits of apricots, peaches and bitter almonds and was first used as a cancer treatment in the 1920's by Dr. Ernest T. Krebs, a California physician. The substance was found to be poison. In 1952, Kreb's son, Ernest T. Krebs Jr., purified the drug and made it safe for human use.

Originally, supporters of Laetrile maintained it penetrates cancer cells and causes them to decompose. Now, proponents view it more as a vitamin supplement.

"They do not treat the cancer per se," Smith says. "They treat the entire body, or the basic cause of cancer--an imbalance of protein in your body. It's just that simple."

Enthusiastic friends of cancer victims may call Laetrile a "cure" but more serious supporters see it as a treatment, he says. They believe the drug, and a special diet, can help give the patient a greater sense of well-being, relieve pain and discourage the spread of the disease.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration (F.D.A.) does not agree. Laetrile can not be legally transported across state lines or prescribed by a doctor.

Most of the Laetrile which is used in the United States is believed to be smuggled into this country from Mexico. Americans also seek treatments in clinics in countries, like Mexico, where the drug is legal.

In June, 1975, Smith says his body was secreting a gallon of fluid a week. There had been damage to his abdominal wall, liver and intestines. "No one, anywhere, under any conditions, gave me a chance to live," he says. He has been told he would have died within about three months if the cancer hadn't been treated.

Smith had heard of Laetrile before he got cancer, but he didn't know how to get any. A friend recommended he check with a doctor in another state. He did. He also read "World Without Cancer" by G. Edward Griffen, a book about Laetrile. "I told my wife, 'that's how I want to be treated,' " he remembers.

Although he investigated other remedies, "I decided right quick the treatment was worse than the cancer."

One doctor wanted to use a kind of therapy which involved mustard gas. "I never had a medical course in my life but I knew I couldn't take mustard gas and survive," Smith says.

The traditional methods of cancer therapy, surgery, radiotherapy and chemotherapy, are frightening, admits Ruth Patterson, the American Cancer Society's area director in central South Carolina. They are also painful and expensive.

This is one reason, medical authorities believe, people turn to drugs like Laetrile. They may also be afraid their doctor has given up hope and that traditional treatments won't help.

According to a brochure published by the Food and Drug Administration, neither the administration, the Canadian Food and Drug Directorate, the National Cancer Institute (NCI), the American Cancer Society or "any other reputable organization" has found any evidence Laetrile helps prevent or treat cancer.

Before the FDA will approve a drug for use in the United States, it has to be shown to be safe and effective. The first tests are done on animals. The drug's developer can then file an Investigational New Drug application with the FDA. If the application is approved, the drug can be tested on people. The drug can't be approved for marketing until the agency is convinced it is both safe and useful in treatment. Laetrile supporters have made several attempts to have the drug approved but have not been successful.

"Our position is that, after 20 years of clinical testing, the American Cancer Society feels Laetrile is worthless in the treatment of cancer," Ms. Patterson says. The members of the organization believe the drug creates false hopes in cancer victims. It may also discourage people from seeking medical treatment when the disease is in its early stages and may be curable, she says.

Laetrile's supporters sometimes maintain the medical community is trying to suppress a drug which could be valuable in treating cancer, she says. However, she has seen many doctors die of cancer. "If doctors knew that Laetrile was valuable, wouldn't they have used it?"

A Columbia physician who treats cancer says he has been asked about the drug by his patients. "I try to persuade them it's not effective," But, he adds, "I let them choose."

His patients have been able to get the drug locally and have taken it. He says he didn't notice any improvement in their condition and neither did they.

"From what I've read it's probably not effective in the treatment of cancer but it apparently does no harm," says another doctor. He believes people should be warned it is ineffective but they should be permitted to use it "strictly on constitutional grounds. If it's not harmful, why should it be withheld from the public?"

Proponents of Laetrile are a mixed lot. They include health food fans, members of the John Birch Society, some doctors and some South Carolina state legislators.

A branch of the Committee for Freedom of Choice in Cancer Therapy Inc. was formed in Columbia a year ago. The group, which advocates use of Laetrile in cancer therapy, sponsored a symposium in April, 1976 in Columbia. The group is now only "semi-active," Smith says.

Dope, biofeedback, etc.

The Big Bust: History has now revealed that John Kennedy was the first president to smoke marijuana in the White House. But Jimmy Carter has smoked it (his son was kicked out of the military for smoking it) and Press Secretary Jody Powell smokes it. Not only that, but Carter's man in charge of federal drug abuse programs, Peter Bourne, told Congress last week that he has smoked marijuana, and finds it harmless, not addictive. He testified that possession of marijuana should be punished, if at all, with nothing more than the equivalent of traffic tickets. Bourne said the harsh sentences meted out for possession do far more harm than the drug itself could ever do. And, he noted, marijuana is far less dangerous than cigarettes (not to mention alcohol).

Old hat, you say? Well, meanwhile back — way back — in South Carolina, Lexington County Sheriff Metts announces a big roundup of dangerous "marijuana pushers," and almost simultaneously with Bourne's Congressional testimony, Columbia police invade a rock concert at Carolina Coliseum, arresting 15 university students and high school kids for possession of marijuana and whatever else they could think up.

Outrageous? Well, babe, this is South Carolina. It's about the poorest state in the union, and not just in dollar terms. It's not really like the rest of America. The state is more like an underdeveloped country ruled by a rightwing dictator. There are people in South Carolina who live deep in fear that someone, somewhere, might be having a good time. And maybe those people pressured the police into going out and throwing some longhairs into prison, just to show they're combating evil.

Or have South Carolina police not yet learned what most police departments in the nation knew years ago? Marijuana is smoked by millions of Americans. Dammit, it's even smoked in the White House! No police force can stop it. They've tried, and in 1969, when Nixon did slow down the flow of dope from Mexico for a few months, all the fool did was to give cocaine the big push it needed to become a popular drug.

> "...There are people in South Carolina who live deep in fear that someone, somewhere, might be having a good time..."

Here in the hinterland, marijuana is still looked on as a killer drug (through a respected, conservative Columbia internist recently told me he had studied the research on marijuana and he finds that it's merely a mild tranquilizer, with no side effects, and no addictive properties). And the police know they can't do much about marijuana - smoking, so they end up selectively enforcing the laws. But this is nothing new in South Carolina. For example, the people who live on Forest Acres' rolling hills are subject to random vandalism on warm weekend nights. People go around tearing down mailboxes, tearing down street signs, pouring paint on new cars, breaking car windows, and of course that old South Carolina tradition — throwing beer cans on other people's lawns. But the residents of Forest Acres say the police never even try to stop the vandalism, because some of the vandals are known to be sons of prominent officials. Ironic, isn't it, that it's not poor people who trash wealthy neighborhoods. It's the sons of the rich. And the police keep hands off.

Biofeedback: It's not just a gimmick. In fact, the medical profession has begun to recognize its value, and serious medical research has been done on the subject, with promising results. Biofeedback teaches one to control his nervous system, and in the meantime it relieves headaches, slows the heartbeat, and can stop all sorts of anxiety - related pains, etc. Better than that, a session of biofeedback leaves one with a natural high.

The technique was developed when scientists tried to find out how Hindu mystics were able to dramatically slow their heart rates and how they could fast for days, how they could, en fin, control their bodies to a fine degree. Biofeedback uses an electromyograph to measure muscle tension. By listening to electromyograph waves, one is able to monitor his state of tension, and one is taught to lower the tension level in a way one didn't know how to before.

I'm taking the biofeedback training now being offered by the U.S.C. psychology department. It's a pleasant kind of training, and the results can be amazing (except today, when I had a session, midway through it I broke up— I kept thinking of Charley Haggers trying on that Ronald Reagan hairpiece on last Sunday's "Mary Hartman"). Anyway, if you have an interest in biofeedback, you might call Beverly Britton at 777-7032 between 10 a.m. and 5 p.m. on weekdays. It costs $20 for the whole deal, but that's much cheaper than some local hospitals, which charge $15 per session. (At the moment they're interested in people with migraine, dermatitis and hyperhydrosis - sweaty palms and feet).

Letters: Osceola readers are no dummies, and they often like to talk back, by writing thoughtful, interesting letters. I now have a small backlog of letters addressed to me personally, letters that require intelligent responses on my part. So be patient. But actually, I prefer that you write letters which can be published. That way, we all get the benefit of your criticism or praise or commentary. It's frustrating to get good letters, that ought to be published, but end with the words, "Please don't publish this letter." For example, I recently got a quite revealing one from an employe of the Richland Memorial emergency room. It couldn't be published. In answer to the "Christ and Emily Dickinson" column, I got some insightful letters from several distinguished persons associated with the clergy. But again, they can't be published. Don't be bashful. If you've got something to say, then say it out. We do still have the First Amendment (even if Sen. Strom Thurmond, South Carolina's living memorial to the Old South, has introduced a bill in Congress which would effectively kill it).

Dennis

Promise them anything

Senator Rembert Dennis took it upon himself last week to instruct Governor James Edwards in the finer points of political hair - splitting. Edwards met with a joint house - senate conference committee on the state budget bill and announced his intentions to veto any legislation that included tax increases. Dennis, lobbying for a one-cent cigarette tax hike, suggested Edwards allow the bill to pass into law without his signature. Edwards replied that he had made "a gentlemen's agreement while campaigning to veto any tax increase ... and I will keep that promise." To do as Dennis suggested would be a "cowardly way" out of the predicament.

Dennis said the governor misunderstood his request. The senate finance chairman was not asking Edwards to breach an agreement. "It takes two sides to have an agreement," Dennis explained. "The people themselves didn't express to you that they didn't want a tax increase for four years." Edward's pledge, Dennis said, was "a promise, not an agreement."

Where's your political savvy, Governor? He isn't asking you to breach an agreement — he wants you to break a promise. It's a different thing entirely, don't you know?

Dorn and his governor Edwards

Bryan Dorn says it "is difficult to understand why (Charles D. "Pug") Ravenel and his governor Edwards, of Charleston, would oppose Russell Dam 200 miles away."

Charleston, Dorn says, has received more government money per capita than any city in the United States. How come they don't want the up-country to get a couple hundred measly million?

Dorn, a former Congressman, unsuccessful candidate for governor, and past master of political innuendo, is dredging up the old "them Charlestonians think they're better'n anybody else" bugaboo once again in his campaign to utterly dam the Savannah River at any cost. (Current cost: $300 million and rising).

It reminds us of a comment Dorn made several years ago while still in Congress that "Castro-inspired environmentalists" were trying to wreck the country.

He has yet to top that one, but he did make another small contribution to the Dorn legend this week when he told reporters opponents of the dam were subversive types who "circulated petitions among little children and organized booing squads at public hearings."

And what's this comment about "Ravenel and his governor Edwards?" Let's try to figure that one out. For the absent-minded among us, Pug Ravenel won the 1974 Democratic gubernatorial primary, defeating Dorn and former Lt. Gov. Earle Morris by impressive margins. Edwards, meanwhile, helped General William Westmoreland "fade away" in the Republican primary. The stage was set for a showdown between the two Charlestonians when the S.C. Supreme Court intervened and ruled Ravenel ineligible because he failed to meet state residency requirements. Many swear to this day that the Court could have ruled either way.

The state party quickly convened and --ignoring the rejection of Dorn by voters during the Democratic primary--chose to place Dorn on the ticket against Edwards. The state's citizenry couldn't choke that down--they sent Dorn back to his Greenwood cattle farm and elected the first Republican governor since Reconstruction.

Is there any doubt that Edwards sits in the state house today because certain powers within the old party structure would rather have him there than Ravenel? Would rather suffer through four years of a Republican chief of state than allow the "progressive" elements within the party to emerge victorious?

If Edwards is anybody's governor, he is the Governor of Dorn, the Democratic henchmen on the Supreme Court, and the aging party plutocrats who attempted to stuff Bryan Dorn down the throats of voters who had made it clear they didn't want him.

Make that "Dorn and his governor Edwards."

Small fry first

It's strictly rumor, but the "usually reliable sources" say that even as the final debate on the death penalty bill begins in earnest in the state house of representatives, corrections officials over at Columbia's Central Correctional Institution (CCI) are sprucing up the electric chair and putting it through its paces.

The chair, which had fallen into disrepair since the last state execution

WZLD replys

Sir:

Mr. Ed Meadows devoted his column in your issue of May sixth to a treatise on the state of Columbia radio. We hope you will allow us a few inches of space to reply, for the benefit of our listeners. Every broadcaster appreciates comments and even criticism of his efforts to serve his community, if the discussion can be kept at a constructive level. When a column like Mr. Meadows' work on May sixth appears, especially when the column contains the hackneyed stereotypes of broadcasting he uses, and is as one-sided, inconsistent, plain inaccurate as his column of the sixth, it calls for some rebuttal. WZLD would have welcomed Mr. Meadows if he had wished information about our station or our operation for use in preparing his column; doubtless the other broadcasters would have been equally willing to help him out.

We regret that his May sixth column may have given a one-sided view of Columbia area radio, and we woud like to make an effort to explain both sides.

WZLD extends an invitation to Mr. Meadows and to our fellow broadcasters of WLTR and WNOK-FM, the other two stations mentioned in Mr. Meadows' column, to discuss the situation of Columbia area radio on our public affairs show Current Edition at the first convenient date. Such a discussion would be of value, we believe, to Columbia's radio listeners, to the management of all three radio stations, and to Mr. Meadows. He called the radio stations of Columbia and vicinity "mediocre and smalltime." One-sided and opinionated columns such as Mr. Meadows' comments of May sixth bring the pages of Osceola down to the level he alleges the broadcasters of Columbia occupy.

Tolerate only ourselves

Sir:

The televised hearings of the Ervin Committee did it for me. As I sat there and listened to the Constitution being envoked after every commercial break, I began to feel that something terribly wrong had happened to the democratic institutions of the country.

Then there were the House Judiciary hearings. The booming voice of Barbara Jordan brought home to me the awful reality of what had happened to the Presidency of the United States.

And throughout the two painful years, the evening news reminded me that I had been betrayed, that persons at the pinnacles of power in the nation had violated the trust I had placed in them.

Finally, there came the night I listened as Dan Rather, looking very small and unimportant standing before the White House, told me there was a "strange" atmosphere in the Capital. He said there was a sense of the unusual, the ominous, in the air. Shortly afterwards, Richard Nixon resigned as President.

I never was a Nixon hater. But I did become a Nixon critic. How could he have done this to me, to the country? How could he have so abused his office? How could he have done all those terrible things? How could he? How could he?

He resigned. I breathed very deeply that night. I was glad. But I also was very sad. I didn't know why I was sad, but I told myself it was because "it" all had happened, that "it" had happened in my country. I suspect that all over the country many other people told themselves the same thing.

The Nixon-Frost interviews have changed my mind. No, I am not unsad about Watergate. No, I have not decided "it" was all okay. Quite to the contrary, I feel even more sad about the whole sorry mess, a mess not limited to the Nixon gang, a mess which I and most everyone else in the country have created and insist on perpetuating.

We in this country are a very noble lot -- except where we as individuals are concerned. We espouse the virtures of honesty, integrity, of "right," and then we make exceptions to the virtues because we "understand" the circumstances; we know that the shortcuts we are taking are not really as unethical as they might appear to others.

But of others we will tolerate no exceptions, no hint of being human. We see evil, we decry evil in others, but we ourselves are always justified. Personality, philosophy, political preference do not matter when it comes to such: liberals cannot see themselves; conservatives overlook themselves.

Richard Nixon did indeed let down the citizens of the country. He did not measure up to the standards we have set for ourselves. Or did he? Did he not seek self-preservation? Did he not seek success? Did he not defend himself against those he saw as his enemies? Did he not trust? Did he not react as most of us would have reacted?

Right now, staunch Nixon supporters are saying that he was mistreated. Right now, staunch Nixon opponents are saying he is still "covering up." Few anybodies are wondering why we allowed a "third rate burglary" to paralyze the nation for two years.

Honestly, are we so naive we expect human beings to be more than human? Politicians are not by nature good or bad; neither are doctors, lawyers, Indian chiefs, journalists or any of us. We are human beings in the business of being human. I do not excuse Nixon; I do not excuse myself. I do not condemn Nixon; I do not condemn myself.

So let the liberals rage. Let the conservatives defend. It does not matter. We are all guilty of messing up the world by expecting more of others than we are willing to abide for ourselves.

Keeping something for whites

Sir:

As I read your article on the two private clubs in Columbia which allegedly refuse membership to blacks, I could not help but wonder what the policy of the protesting 13 member Black Legislative Caucus is toward accepting whites.

If there is a reason for separate caucus groups for blacks and whites, surely the same reason would apply to selection for membership in other groups.

Perhaps you would like to do a story on the reason there are Black Colleges which appeal on the radio for money, a contest for Miss Black America, and a Black Caucus...all openly made public, and such an uproar about groups which quietly prefer to keep something together for whites. Don't you think that attitude is hypocritical?

Laetrile underground in South Carolina

looking to order some more. It's a good way to get Vitamin B 17 and B 15. There are no limitations," she says.

Of course, what she doesn't say is that some people believe the substances in the kernels can prevent and treat cancer. A court might call that practicing medicine without a license. "We could get locked up for that," she says.

However, customers have told her eating the kernels can help their bodies fight cancer. They appear to buy them for that reason, she says.

Mike, a local member of the John Birch Society, says he supports the use of Laetrile partly because he doesn't like traditional cancer treatments, or "cut, burn and poison, as we call it."

His father, Mike, was a robust man of 88 when he got cancer. He was treated with radiation. "The radiation was a success, too bad the patient was burned to death," he says.

Although the John Birch Society doesn't officially advocate the use of Laetrile, many of its members do. "The thing about us beady-eyed Birchers, we're pretty much individualists and we sure don't like Big Brother telling us what to do and it's killing us. And now we find it's literally killing us," he says.

Smith believes his cancer has been arrested. Although he never again expects to be able to handle a full-time job, he says he is "very active." He sometimes walks a mile for "routine exercise." Smith expects to have to watch his diet and take Laetrile for the rest of his life. "Some people think we're anti-medicine. We're not. The thing is you have to get a doctor that is familiar with Laetrile. If you talk to a doctor and you find one who'll be perfectly candid with you, you'll find one who'll tell you chemo and cobalt treatment are not the answer."

Although Smith said he has a policy of revealing no names of doctors administering Laetrile, no patients taking Laetrile, and no individuals distributing Laetrile, he did say he knew of many Columbia area residents who were being treated or were treating themselves with the "food supplement." Doctors sometimes send cancer patients to talk with me," he said. "Many of them come and listen and go away. I see their obituaries later in the paper. A lot of people are uneasy about Laetrile because of its semi-legal status."

Others begin the treatments, Smith said, but lack the self-discipline to remain on the rigid diet and develop the positive psychological state that he believes is an integral part of the Laetrile treatment. "I don't try to tell (the cancer victims) what to do; I just tell them about my experience. I never refer anyone to my own doctor. I ask them who their doctor is, and if he is one who I know uses Laetrile as part of his treatment, I tell them to ask their doctor about it. If he isn't, or I don't know, I tell them they'll have to look around for themselves."

Smith says that Laetrile treatments are not an extremely expensive kind of cancer therapy. The first three weeks, when he took 30 to 40 cc's daily, were the most expensive. He now pays $11 for a 10 cc vial of the drug and $1.04 for each tablet. Smith estimates he has taken 225 to 250 vials of Laetrile since he began treatments.

Smith is convinced that the nation's large pharmeceutical companies have been instrumental in surpressing the treatment methods advocated by Laetrile users and others who place heavy emphasis on diet and attitude. "The drug companies can't patent Laetrile and they can't patent nutrition," he said, "and they'll do anything to protect their interests in drug-related treatments." Smith believes the drug companies--supported by the medical establishment--have gone so far as to carry out personal vendettas against prominent Laetrile advocates, having them prosecuted for practicing medicine without a license, and in the case of M.D.'s, having them thrown out of medical associations or having their licenses to practice revoked. He said matter-of-factly during an interview that unnamed forces made an unsuccessful attempt to poison one Georgia advocate who had successfully treated himself and several members of his family for cancer.

A physician, who did not wish to be quoted by name, says he has treated "a lot of people" with Laetrile in the three and a half years he has been working with it.

He became acquainted with it at a God, Family and Country Rally in Philadelphia in 1973. After seeing the film "World Without Cancer," he talked with Dr. John Richardson, a California physician who uses Laetrile.

"Some of the things he was telling me I found hard to believe, but in talking to him I found he was a good doctor who was interested in doing what was good for his patients," he remembers.

The first patient he treated was a man with lung cancer who didn't want cobalt treatments or chemotherapy. "I was sort of afraid, not knowing what to expect."

Two weeks after the man began using Laetrile, he came to the doctor and said he was feeling fine. "Right then I should have taken an X-ray." He believes an excessive number of X-rays are dangerous and didn't.

The man's wife was skeptical about Laetrile. He stopped taking it and began cobalt treatments. "Immediately after they finished the course with cobalt, they took an X-ray and the tumor was gone," the doctor says. Shortly afterwards, it reappeared in several places and the man died.

The doctor believes Laetrile helped the patient but the cobalt treatments encouraged the tumor to spread.

Cancer, he believes, is a "generalized deficiency disease." The body may have vitamin, mineral, nutrient or enzyme deficiencies. A tumor is just a localized expression of the disease.

This contrasts with traditional medical theory which says it is not a single disease but a combination of about 100 different clinical problems.

He says Laetrile is a vitamin, not a drug, which treats this deficiency. "We can't offer it as a cure for cancer. We offer it as a treatment. If you can control a disease, you can live with it," he says.

It is part of a "metabolic therapy" which includes eating proper foods. "The American diet today is just horrible," he emphasizes.

"Laetrile attacks the cancer cell and only the cancer cell immediately and a by-product of the Laetrile metabolism is a mild pain reliever and it relieves the pain." The effectiveness of the treatment depends on how far the cancer has progressed. The patient should have more energy and stamina and his appetite should improve.

Laetrile may eventually reduce the size of the tumor but the doctor says he is more concerned with stopping its growth.

Doctors who object to the use of Laetrile do so mainly because they haven't taken the trouble to investigate it, he says. He sympathizes with a certain skepticism. "There's only one thing I believe without any doubt and that's God's holy word." But he thinks they should be more open-minded about cancer treatment.

The United States government is another matter. He believes it opposes the use of Laetrile because the government is controlled by a group headed by New York financier David Rockefeller. "Our chief politician is David Rockefeller," he emphasizes. Rockefeller, the Council on Foreign Relations and other groups are "all trying to do the same things: bring this country to the state where it can be merged with the Communist party," he says.

He also says there are objections to it because neither the government or major drug companies will make money from it.

The doctor was expelled from the Lee County (Fort Myers), Florida Medical Association for using Laetrile. He finds it ironic that on May 3, almost three years to the day after it happened, the Florida legislature voted to legalize the use of Laetrile.

The Indiana legislature approved a similar bill on April 30. The use of Laetrile is already permitted in Alaska. "It's just a matter of time before this thing breaks nationally," Smith says.

Rep. Jarvis Klapman, R-Lexington, has introduced a bill which would permit doctors to use Laetrile as a cancer treatment, if a patient asks for it. The law would make doctors immune from a suit by a patient or from disciplinary action by the South Carolina Medical Association.

However, the bill does not say how a doctor could use a drug which can not be legally transported across state lines. "It's up to the doctor and the patient to get it," Klapman says. "If it's available, they can prescribe it." He says pressure from states where the drug can be used may force the FDA to change its stand on Laetrile. "This is a government of states rather than federal bureacracy, in my opinion," he says.

Klapman tried to get the bill on the House calendar without committee action. He was unsuccessful and it has been referred to the House committee on medical, military, public and municipal affairs. He says he doesn't expect any action on it until next session.

A friend of Smith's, Klapman says he became interested in the bill after Smith appeared before the Lexington County delegation and asked for such legislation. He says he isn't "anti-medicine" but does believe that natural remedies have a place. Some of his friends have been so impressed by Smith's recovery that they have taken to chewing apricot pits.

"Until somebody proves to me it (Laetrile) is detrimental, I think they have a right to use it," Klapman concludes.

Julian Morgan, a Spartanburg attorney, tried a different method to obtain Laetrile legally for his ailing father. He and another lawyer asked the U.S. District Court for a temporary injunction that would allow him to obtain a six months supply of the substance for his father.

Judge Robert Chapman refused to grant the request. To do so, he said, would bypass laws which regulate drugs and would provide an argument for the distribution of unproven remedies. He also said he did not believe Laetrile has been shown to be safe and effective in cancer treatment.

"The only evidence presented to this court of any benefit Laetrile might provide in the treatment of cancer is that in some instances individuals taking it seem to experience diminishing pain and increase in appetite, weight gain and psychological improvement," Chapman said. "This is consistent with the effect a placebo would produce."

Morgan did not pursue the case beyond the district court. His father died shortly before the court order was released and he was "disheartened in more ways than one."

> "...'Until somebody proves to me it (Laetrile) is detrimental, I think they have a right to use it,' Klapman concludes..."

Although Morgan disagrees that Laetrile is a placebo, he says those who believe it is a placebo should allow its use "if it works, if psychology is that important."

"Until the orthodox people have the answer, and they don't have it now, until they can come up and say "We've go the answer. We've got the solution,' I don't see why they should try to surpress anyone else who is trying to come up with the big answer," Morgan says.

A small trophy on Smith's coffee table proclaims he is the "World's Greatest Politician." A member of the Springdale town council, he likes to joke that some of his political adversaries wish Laetrile hadn't worked on him. He has tried to remain light-hearted in the face of a frightening disease. "We laugh about it," he says. "It don't help to cry about it."

There have been cases in which cancer has gone into remission or in which the body has some how managed to cure itself. Smith comes across as a gutsy kind of guy. It isn't hard to imagine that his case is one of these but he will never accept that.

"I've had people tell me I was strong-willed and it was a mind over matter," he says, "but there's no way you can make me believe this."

The Seabrook Nuclear protest: a testing ground for non-violent citizen action

Demonstrators at Nuclear-plantsite in New Hampshire

Three weeks ago the small New Hampshire town of Seabrook was occupied by 2000 protestors who established a tent city on the site of the Seabrook Nuclear Station to protest the construction of two of the world's largest nuclear reactors. A day after the occupation began, New Hampshire governor Meldrim Thomson Jr. ordered the demonstrators to leave the site or face arrest. Fourteen hundred protestors refused to leave and were arrested and charged with criminal trespass.

The protestors were jailed at national guard armories at a cost to the state of $50,000 per day. Most refused to post bond of up to $500 and remained incarcerated until late last week when they were tried, found guilty, fined and released.

The demonstration was the largest protest against construction of nuclear power facilities ever staged in the United States. The Clamshell Alliance, a coalition of New England environmental groups which planned the protest, plans to stage another on-site protest next year at which they believe more than 18,000 protestors will appear.

Several representatives of South Carolina environmental and anti-nuclear groups journeyed to New Hampshire to join in the demonstration. Soscol contributor Ted Harris was there and has prepared a two-part series on the Seabrook protest and its relationship to nuclear development in South Carolina.

I've always felt that anybody who disagrees with the civil law in a matter of conscience has a right to openly express that disobedience. At the same time, under our societal structure, it is necessary that they be willing to take the consequences of their disobedience.

The central issue in the development of nuclear power is whether or not the radioactive inventory of nuclear plants can be sufficiently kept away from all forms of life for periods ranging up to millions of years.

Wilson Clark,
Energy for Survival, 1975

Seabrook, New Hampshire is a small coastal town famed for its seafood and antiques. It is 46 miles from Boston and about an hour and a quarter from Concord, New Hampshire's state capital and home of publisher William Loeb and Republican Governor Meldrim Thomson.

On the first weekend of this month, Seabrook was the scene of the largest demonstration of opposition to nuclear power in this country's history. The target of the approximately 2500 anti-nuclear activists, representing delegations of 28 states, including South Carolina, was the proposed Seabrook Station, a twin reactor nuclear plant planned by the Public Service Company of New Hampshire (PSC), a private investor-owned utility.

An organization called the Clamshell Alliance had done the grassroots organizing for what it called a "direct citizen action." The Clamshell, through some forty New Hampshire and wider New England groups, organized teach-ins, collected signatures on petitions, held public meetings and generally encouraged people throughout New England to actively oppose nuclear power. The Alliance had, in all its literature, characterized nuclear fission as the least economical and most dangerous of our energy options. Its systematic approach to organizing is best characterized by the "better active today than radioactive tomorrow" posters displayed throughout Seabrook and carried by all the major U.S. television networks.

Organizers believed the first few days of the action would produce three specific responses. It would 1) plunge New Hampshire into a governmental crisis of mammoth proportions; 2) push the United States into a new stage of intense dialogue over the viability of nuclear power option, and 3) place before the international community the prospect of a growing citizen direct-action opposition to nuclear technology, whether for electrification or weaponry; a phenomenon of Australia, Japan, Europe and now of the United States.

For six years, residents of Seabrook and bordering towns had opposed the project, which at 2300 megawatts was to be one of the world's largest. Their opposition was based on 4 specific objections:

One. The immediate and perpetual impact of the plant's location and operation on the marshlands and the ocean. This they contended would be devastating. (The plants' cooling system would take in 1.2 billion gallons of water daily--ocean water--and return it 40 degrees hotter into one of the nation's richest fish and lobster breeding grounds).

Two. The fact that more and more evidence concerning the economics and health costs and the social and ethical costs of nuclear waste disposal is coming in every day. Evidence, according to Seabrook residents, that speaks strongly against the plant.

Three. The increasing incompatibility of democratic processes and nuclear power; increasing centralization of energy decisions, historic conflicts of interest in the regulation of the nuclear industry, and very real erosions of civil liberties due to the security in the pre-plutonium economy.

Four. The fact that there is no need for the Seabrook plant. PSC projections of a 7.5 percent rate of growth in electrical demand conflict with the fact that recent New Hampshire demand has remained almost constant while that of Vermont and Massachusetts has actually declined.

Through groups such as the Seacoast Anti-Pollution League (SAPL), the New England Coalition of Nuclear Pollution (NECNP) and the National Audobon Society, a series of legal interventions in licensing and regulatory proceedings with the Atomic Energy Commission (now the Nuclear Regulatory Commission) has been pursued. Because of the efforts of the citizen interveners, people throughout New Hampshire became increasingly aware of the presence and the possible implications of the Seabrook project. Awareness of the intervenors' case against Seabrook was coupled with an equally increasing awareness of the track records of the AEC and the NRC.

Studies done at George Washington University have characterized the AEC-NRC process as "largely inhospitable" to citizens' groups. Common Cause has found that 65 per cent of the NRC's top 429 employees came from private companies regulated or contracted by the NRC. Ultimately, the fact that the AEC-NRC licensing boards have never stopped the final licensing of a plant took on a new meaning.

Despite the efforts of the intervenors, a temporary construction license for Seabrook was issued in July of last year. The Clamshell Alliance was formed shortly afterwards to permanently halt construction through non-violent action.

The construction of one of the world's largest nuclear stations at Seabrook would be in many ways analogous to its placement at Sullivan's Island, S.C. Guy Chichester, one of several spokespersons for the Clamshell, has called the Seabrook project one of the most outstanding examples of bad planning, duplicity, and complicity of industry and regulatory agencies. He told the National Observer that "the threat to the natural environment was much greater here: ninety percent of all species of shell fish and finfish that live in the North Atlantic...begin their lives in the estuary system, where the plant would discharge its hot water effluent."

It is important to remember that the Seabrook project was not attempted in a political vacum. New Hampshire is one of the nation's most conservative states. Public opinion and social values in New Hampshire have long been influenced by the editorial line of ultra-conservative William Loeb, publisher of the state's most widely read daily newspaper, The Manchester Union Leader.

The emergence of a man like Meldrim Thomson and his reelection to a third two-year term as governor was not surprising. Thomson, a Georgian with John Birch roots and the current national chairman of the conservative National Caucus, has built his political career in New Hampshire by refusing to endorse income or sales taxes. This stand has been exceedingly popular within his own state and has attracted an increasing stream of emmigrants from "Taxachusetts" to the south.

The tax issue has marked Thomson as a consummate politician, but his tenure in office has also been marked by statements and semi-official acts characterized by some as controversial - by others as extreme. It was Thomson who proposed arming the New Hampshire National Guard with tactical nuclear weapons. It was the Governor who aroused the ire of Jews in his state by lowering the state flag on Good Friday. He repeated the gesture when President Carter announced his decision on amnesty for draft resistors. Finally, it was the Governor again who, upon hearing that Roman Catholic priests were requesting a boycott on Gallo wine products as a part of support for striking farm workers, asked reporters to accompany him to the state-owned liquor store to watch him purchase a bottle.

It is doubtful whether either Thomson or Loeb, both strong nuclear proponents, were quite ready for the meeting held one March evening in 1976. That night in Seabrook, the town meeting convened to vote on the proposed nuclear station. Rejecting the exaggerated promises of a business boom, increased jobs and tax benefits, the town voted against the nuclear plant 768 to 632. But as Harvey Wasserman, a Clamshell spokesperson, was to point out later, mere ideological consistency was not going to interfere with the Seabrook Nuclear Project. Abandoning "home-rule" rhetoric, the Loeb-Thomson team blamed the unfavorable vote on "outsiders."

Mr. and Mrs. A.H. Gustavson own a farm on Route 88, three miles west of the Seabrook plant. They are not "outsiders." Insiders would be a better term. Parents of a son and daughter, who are in their mid-twenties, they were early opponents of the Seabrook plant. During this past spring they offered their home and grounds to the Clamshell Alliance as a coordinating headquarters and reception area for the press. It was at the Gustavson farm that Osceola spoke with one member of the South Carolina delegation, Patrick Kwarta.

Os: The press conference held at the Clamshell headquarters a few hours prior to the occupation was given international media coverage. A representative of the South Carolina delegation made what seemed to be an important statement about the presence of that delegation. Could you discuss that statement and characterize the reasons for your participation?

Kwarta: South Carolina is the nuclear capital of the world. Our participation in the Seabrook action was planned well in advance and closely coordinated with the Clamshell. Our main focus in the South Carolina anti-nuclear movement is on the rear end of the nuclear cycle. The Barnwell Nuclear Fuel Plant represents the closing of that fuel cycle. Seabrook would produce material for reprocessing and waste disposal that would be transported across the country - its final destination - Barnwell, South Carolina, 60 miles from our home in Columbia. We felt that the first direct citizen action was a historic event. We felt that our presence at Seabrook would stimulate unified citizen opposition to nuclear power in South Carolina. Civil disobedience is a natural response to the infringement of citizen rights when the legal process has failed. Although at crucial town meetings, Seabrook residents have voted against the plant, the owners and developers of the plant and the federal government have refused to acknowledge the basic rights of the citizens.

Os: Could you highlight and describe the dynamics of the action?

Kwarta: I couldn't possibly characterize two and a half weeks of primal therapy in a hundred words or less.

Os: Please try.

Kwarta: When you're talking about 2,500 people, aged 20 to 60 years old, you're talking about a diversified citizen action group - a little hard to characterize.

Os: Give us some basic facts.

Kwarta: Before anyone could participate in the occupation, each person was required to attend a day-long seminar on non-violent action and other occupation guidelines. Each person received a handbook and supplements. These materials were also sent to the Seabrook Police, The New Hampshire Police and National Guard. Law enforcement officials were well prepared for the occupation, which was a carefully planned non-violent action. Relations with National Guard and state police were excellent. They realized we did not consider them to be enemies in any way whatsoever. Many of these officials also felt threatened by the presence of a nuclear plant. In addition the policy of the Clamshell was to prohibit occupiers from coming in contact with fenced property of the PSC. Clamshell crews in fact were responsible for a total clean-up of the plant site following the occupation.

Os: Can you describe the public atmosphere leading up to the occupation?

Kwarta: The statement of Governor Thomson at an April 29 press conference sought to create a hysterical atmosphere aided by the editorializing of the Manchester Union Leader publisher, William Loeb. Thomson and his aider tried to convince the people of New Hampshire and indeed of the nation, of an extraordinary criminal conspiracy. Thomson called the preparations of the Clamshell "a cover for terrorist activities" and the Governor talked of secret intelligence reports that indicated outside groups would be descending upon Seabrook with the intentions of creating violent disturbances.

Os: Were you aware of the activities of any such groups?

Kwarta: On the contrary, there was an intense dedication to the philosophy and practice of nonviolence. In fact part of the occupiers' training involved preparation for diffusing activities of outside or government provocateurs. This tactic was, of course, nonviolent also.

Os: What did 2,500 people do during the 24-hour occupation of the nuclear site?

Kwarta: We had very little time to organize municipal services for a city of 2,500 people. But we almost did it.

Os: Can you be more specific?

Kwarta: Yes. Our democratic form of government – highly decentralized decision-making -- was developed prior to and was used throughout the occupation. In addition to the decision-making process, medical, sanitation, and information distribution centers were set up. An elaborate use of individual workshops was developed. Just a few of these workshop topics included: 1) Health Effects of Radiation. 2) Solar Alternatives, including the building of a working solar collector. 3) The Ethical Problems of Nuclear Energy. 4) Social, Political and Economic Problems of Nuclear Power.

If the arrests had not come when they did we could, with fresh supplies, have occupied indefinitely. Our city would have flourished. Working people, housewives, medical personnel, college students, scientists, lawyers, all made contributions during the life of the tent city.

Os: Was the New Hampshire state government involved in a power struggle during negotiations?

Kwarta: Yes. An immediate dicotomy existed within the state government. On the other side, Meldrim Thomson through the Attorney General exercised incredible pressure -- at certain points he personally manipulated the legal process. For those of us working as negotiators, Thomson's tactics were immediate proof of the power of certain influential people to take control of and distort decision-making processes. This is the history of nuclear power in the last 40 years. Small groups of people making decisions that affect not only millions of Americans, but the total global population. On the other hand, sentiment among New Hampshire residents favored procuring bail for the immediate release of all 1,400 persons incarcerated within the five armories. Thomson's tactics - denying immediate release on personal recognizance cost the state 50,000 dollars a day. This severly depleted the New Hampshire Treasury. It was obvious at this point that the government intended to diffuse the nuclear issue by concentrating on New Hampshire's fiscal crisis.

> "...'We felt that our presence at Seabrook would stimulate unified citizen opposition to nuclear power in South Carolina. Civil disobedience is a natural response to the infringement of citizen rights when the legal process has failed'..."

(In the next issue of Osceola, two of South Carolina's representatives will discuss their experiences as political prisoners of the State of New Hampshire. Their motives for travelling 1,000 miles to participate in the occupation of Seabrook will provide insight into the very distinct relationship between that northern nuclear plant and the development of nuclear power in South Carolina.)

Lynyrd Skynyrd

by Barbara Ballinger

The initial national prominence of Southern blues rock was primarily if not exclusively due to the meteoric rise of the Allman Brothers. Although they broke ground for a number of bands with similar roots, the Allman Brothers, at their height, were arguably one of the best bands in the country, and a damned hard act for such bands to follow. Their popularity, however, instigated not only national attention, but also the development of a fierce regional pride among Southern kids, a pride that has become focused on such groups as Charlie Daniels, the Atlanta Rhythm Section, the Marshall Tucker Band, and particularly the badass rowdies Lynyrd Skynyrd, the latter largely on the basis of their single "Sweet Home Alabama."

An agressive, dynamic band featuring three (count 'em) guitarists and a lead singer who is alternately ominous and amusing, but always cool, Lynyrd Skynyrd and opening acts the Outlaws and Nazareth treated the Carolina Coliseum audience to a basically well-placed show of controlled abandon May 11.

The Outlaws started the evening with a driving but uninspired set. Basically a rock and roll band with a few countrified numbers, they're not bad, just don't do much of anything that hasn't been done better before. Their songs "South Carolina" and "Knoxville Girls" were well received, but I found them contrived.

The Scottish Band Nazareth, recording veterans with seven albums under their belts, played spare and powerful rock and roll uncomplicated by any kind of cerebral interference. The emotions they deal with are gut level, drives and passions; sex as love (in "Born to Love" and "I Want to Do Everything For You"), aggression against pain, your classic angry young men against the world. Not for a moment are they anything but tough up there, but there is still a kind of purity and innocence about this kind of rock that I find captivating at the most basic level.

Being receptive to them requires listening from that swirly childlike world of feeling without understanding, all those chaotic drives that struggle with our grown-up attempts to control them. Simply, "Love Hurts," no whys or wherefores. Blatant and aggressive sexuality fill Nazareth's music (alas their version is standard, stereotypical, objectifying macho, the source of my ambivalence for them), from their suggestive grinding rhythms to Manuel Chartton's wild and aimless guitar solos, to lead singer Dan McCafferty's lyrics and posturing, and the sheer volume that is more sensation than sound.

They were subliminally and increasingly exciting, and lifted the crowd to a fever of anticipation for Lynyrd Skynyrd.

There is something uncontrolled about Lynyrd Skynyrd on stage, an effect mostly created by the three guitarists. Drummer Artimus Pyle is avid but serious, and singer Ronnie Van Zant in his gambler's hat is always cool. But Steve Gaines, Gary Rossington, and tall Allen Collins (who sways wildly like a sapling in a windstorm when he plays), all on guitar, despite the tightness of their playing, continually gave the impression that any moment they would whirl and scatter not only themselves but the assorted elements of their music to all corners of the stage. At one point during "Gimme Three Steps," they all surged to the front of the stage with bassist Leon Wilkeson, and played in a disorderly line looking amazingly like a team of chariot horses harnessed impatiently and temporarily together.

Lynyrd Skynyrd opened with "Working for MCA," with hot and nasty guitar solos by Gaines and Rossington starting the evening's trade off of licks and runs. Collins took the major solo in "I Ain't the One," his flowing white robe creating an ethereal look quite at odds with the band's image and the kind of music blasting off the stage. Lynyrd Skynyrd kept at about the same energy level through a new tune, then did a menacing "Saturday Night Special," accompanied by what appeared to be total disarray on stage. "Call Me the Breeze" featured a solo by keyboard man Billy Powell, who ripped up and down his piano keys with evident satisfaction.

Outlaw Henry Paul joined the band briefly on guitar for a vigorous "T For Texas," making no particular impact on the song, and disappeared when Lynyrd Skynyrd brought those in the crowd who were still seated roaring to their feet with the obligatory, jaunty "Sweet Home Alabama." It's the band's anthem, and they play it like they mean it.

Lynyrd Skynyrd retired briefly from the stage, then returned to encore with "Free Bird," an exercise in band-audience dynamics. They worked together steadily, gradually increasing tempo and tension until Collins burst loose on his solo, holding and repeating some riff until the tension was just incredible, only to ease down slightly to have the other guitarists join him, and build the whole thing back up higher than it had been before, the drums thundering behind, the three guitars surprisingly powerful.

At this point someone turned these blinding, impossibly bright lights into the audience, for what purpose I purely don't know. The effect for me was to break my concentration from the stage, trying to get the painful dazzle out of my eyes. It was difficult after that to get reabsorbed in the subtleties of the music, so I just sat back and enjoyed the power and energy as the band teased the crowd through several false endings before the crashing, discordant finale.
